Use of Patient's Personal Mobile Device

Patient Personal Mobile Device Vulnerabilities

While the University of New Mexico takes every precaution to ensure the security of Telehealth applications that we provide, because we do not manage your personal mobile device (PC, Mac, Tablet, Smartphone, etc.), we cannot foresee the risks that they present. For example, while the Telehealth application that runs on your smartphone is secure, there are many other applications that are installed on that same device which have not been reviewed for security. Further, by visiting websites your smartphone may have been “infected” with malicious “malware” that can capture audio, images, key strokes, contacts, and data.

Therefore, by participating in this UNM Telehealth program, you acknowledge that your personal mobile device presents risks, and accept responsibility for those risks and the management of your device.

What can I do to minimize risk to the security of my mobile device?

- The most important measure is to use password protection that is not shared with anyone else, and being careful with any sharing of that device.
- Be careful about allowing storage of passwords.
- Be sure that your device is current on updates sent out by device and application makers (Microsoft, IOS, etc.).
- Be aware of what data is being automatically backed-up from your device into the cloud.
- Sometimes saved data cannot be truly erased.
- Be careful with the connectivity that your mobile device is using. Publicly shared WiFi is not secure.
